

Markle Symposium, October 24 & 25, 2016

Financial Crimes: Bridging the Gap between Public & Private Sectors

This year's Arnold Markle Symposium is a journey into the dark web of financial and cybercrimes, identity theft, and the creation of synthetic identities. These crimes, particularly those involving the internet or communication networks, are growing astronomically, and both the public and private sectors are facing investigations that cross both real and virtual boundaries. This year's symposium is bridging the gap by bringing in leaders from law enforcement and private industry to discuss the issues being faced by us all. Panel discussions will cover contemporary issues from multiple points of view to create a unified front in combating these growing issues. Because the victims of these crimes are from all facets of America, this is a critical educational symposium for professionals no matter the rank or title. We look forward to seeing you at the 2016 Markle Symposium.

Mission, Vision and Needs

The Lee Institute's mission is to link scholars, students, law enforcement, the legal community and professional practitioners to address scientific and social issues facing forensic science and the criminal justice system. The Symposium is the venue by which the Lee Institute continues Arnold Markle's vision that education will lead to more successful investigations. This year the Lee Institute is stepping over the traditional boundary of forensic science and criminal investigations into the opaque world of the forensics of financial and cybercrime. The Markle Symposium will highlight financial and cybercrime investigations through mixed panel discussions of current issues, of the impact of these crimes on society, and of the misconception that these are victimless crimes.

The Henry Lee Institute of Forensic Science has traditionally kept tuition and fees for the Markle Symposium at a minimum through sponsorships. Your generous support of this year's Symposium will help us to maintain this tradition.
